An energy efficient garage matters

Proper maintenance of your garage will make it energy efficient and prevent the temperature inside it from being dramatically different from the temperature inside your house. If your garage door is not insulated correctly, it can cause precious heat or cool air to be lost to the outside and drive up your energy bill.

Here are some tips to make your garage door more energy efficient:

- Make sure the door is insulated. Most newer garage doors have built-in insulation, while older doors are thinner and don't have that added insulation.
- Check the door area for gaps. If you have an older garage door that's been through some wear and tear (or a newer door that's sustained damage), there's a chance air is escaping through holes or cracks in or around the door. If you do spot some gaps, it's time to consider a new garage door.
- Choose light-colored paint on your new door. Dark paint tends to absorb heat and sunlight, heating up your garage much faster on those sweltering days.
